Architecture is a social art.

Mo 5. Dezember 2011, 19.30 Uhr im Forum

Vortrag von Tony Fretton, Architekt, London

Architectural ideas begin for me when I notice something in life, nature, a city or building. I see how these things embody social ideas and imagery and in turn are given meaning by the activities and thoughts of the people who use them. From these bases I am able to make buildings that extend beyond simple formalism and visuality to broader fields of experience and ideas. For me Architecture is a social art producing on one hand objects for physical and emotional occupation and on the other contributions to the cultural ideas by which societies operate. More specifically it has the capacity to construct a positive and operable realism from the circumstances of the project and conditions of the modern world and offer it as transforming experience.
